

In a week which saw another brutal violation of human rights in Zimbabwe, South Africa offered a glimmer of hope that it could help resolve the crisis.

South Africa's International Relations Minister Naledi Pandor identified Zimbabwe's political and economic crisis as being caused by the hostility between its political leaders. Addressing a symposium on Zimbabwe in Pretoria, she said: 'We would be greatly assisted in playing a positive role if we knew there was a shared notion in Zimbabwe of what must be done.'

She continued: 'This is an extremely important point for us because, while indeed as the South African government, we work very closely with the government of Zimbabwe, it would be difficult for us to be seen as playing a role only with the government . . . We need to be provided with a path that indicates that as we enter to provide support, all the parties, all groups and all stakeholders in Zimbabwe are at one with that assistance that support must be.'

MDC leader Nelson Chamisa said he was heartened by Dr Pandor's 'correct diagnosis of the major problem in Zimbabwe as toxic politics'. He said: 'We, in the MDC, stand ready to welcome South Africa and SADC's mediation in Zimbabwe to end the suffering that has gone on for far too long, and give our people hope. In the face of provocation and persecution, our commitment to a sustainable, peaceful outcome has not shrunk.' (See:

Chamisa was speaking just hours after police used teargas to disperse party supporters who had gathered at the MDC's headquarters in Harare. Many people were savagely beaten with baton sticks. A senior American official, Tibor Nagy condemned what he described as the 'unprovoked use of force against peaceably assembled Zimbabweans'.

Other points

- A report tabled in Parliament by the Public Accounts Committee said the government had taken US$3.2 billion from depositors' bank accounts before introducing the bond notes in 2016. The Committee, chaired by former MDC Finance Minister Tendai Biti said the Central Bank used the money to finance government operations without parliament's approval (see: htt

- In another embarrassment for the government, China has complained that the recent budget understated Chinese aid to Zimbabwe. The budget said China had provided US$3.6 million in the first 9 months of the year while the real figure was closer to US$137 million.

- The government has decided to name roads in all the provinces after President Mnangagwa. Other Zanu PF leaders are also being honoured. Tendai Biti tweeted: 'The public hospital system has collapsed. Citizens are dying like flies. The power blackouts are now permanent. Hyperinflation has spiralled out of control. But they sat and named roads after themselves. Easily the worst government in the history of governments.' (See:
